1. Statement

Novelty (N)	Claims	1-25	YES
	Claims	None	NO
Inventive step (IS)	Claims	None	YES
	Claims	1-25	NO
Industrial applicability (IA)	Claims	1-25	YES
	Claims	None	NO

2. Citations and explanations :

The present invention relates to a method for managing configurations of devices in a system that communicates information between a device and an enterprise.

Reference is made to following documents:

D1: US 2005-0055397 A1 (ZHU, Y. et. al) 10 MARCH 2005

D2: US 2006-0236325 A1 (RAO, B.R. et. al) 19 OCTOBER 2006

D3: US 7,028,081 B2 (KAWASHIMA, M.) 11 April 2006

D1 relates to a system and method for an Open Mobile Alliance (OMA: www.openmobilealliance.org/Technical/DM.aspx) Device Management (DM) extension that manages vendor specific configuration parameters and settings for mobile devices.

D2 relates to a device client which supports customer care and distribution of update packages to electronics devices, and a terminal management/device management server which employs extensions to an industry standard device management protocol for updating configuration information and managing the electronic devices.

D3 relates to a network-device management program for controlling network devices connected to a computer network which reduces the load of the network and the devices by preserving device information acquired from each device and not acquiring new information from the device for a predetermined period.

1. Novelty and Inventive step

The subject matter of claim 1 relates to a method for managing configurations of the devices, the method comprising: building a defined configuration for a device type; comparing an actual configuration of the device to the defined configuration; determining if the values of actual configuration match the corresponding value requirements; running business logic associated with the device based on a result from the step of determining; and storing the matched configurations.

Claim 1 meets the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2) with respect to novelty, but claim 1 lacks an inventive step under PCT Article 33(3), because D1 discloses a process for managing the configurations of mobile devices using OMA DM protocol and D2 discloses a system for remotely managing a plurality of electronic devices via a communication network.

Continuation of:

(From Box V)

Claims 2-16, which are directly or indirectly dependent on claim 1, meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2) with respect to novelty.

However, claims 2-16 lack an inventive step under PCT Article 33(3) because D1 discloses a method for providing an OMA DM protocol for managing specified configuration settings associated with a mobile device, and D2 discloses a communication network supporting management of an electronic device via a wireless infrastructure and OMA DM tree structures.

The subject matter of claim 17 relates to a system for managing configurations of devices, the system comprising: a server, a database, and an enterprise.

Claim 17 meets the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2) with respect to novelty, but claim 17 lacks an inventive step under PCT Article 33(3), because D1 discloses a mobile device management system comprising a server for device management and a data store, and D2 discloses a terminal management/device management system including a self-care website /portal, a customer care server, a download server, a device management server, a diagnostics server, and a provisioning server.

Claims 18-25 which are directly or indirectly dependent on claim 17 meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(2) with respect to novelty.

However, claims 18-25 lack an inventive step under PCT Article 33(3), because the technical features of claims 18-25 lie within the general capabilities of the skilled person having knowledge of an OMA DM server in D1 and a terminal management/device management server in D2.

2. Industrial Applicability

Claims 1-25 meet the criteria set out in PCT Article 33(1) and thus have industrial applicability because the subject matter claimed can be made or used in industry.
